

ANGELINE DEKKER

Inside is outside the inner world as outside architecture and always in construction

Angeline Dekker: "If everything is in motion there is no static at all. Everything flows. In my view a society or community is a construction, like human beings themselves are constructions, equal to buildings.

Architectural buildings carry a process. They move - like everything/people - from construction to decay.

In my installations I want to show this instability and vulnerability of seemingly indestructible buildings/entities. These installations can degenerate, be under construction and be rebuild again.

Because every structure is composed of construction elements, I do make these element myself at the moment".

Project in an original elevator that has now been divided into separate elevator areas. I see these two separate spaces as two entities that I wanted to make tangible. Two different entities with their own character as an inner conflict
as can also take place in a psychological body.
