LEONIE BRANDNER

collecting glitter at the edge of what I can perceive

I make objects out of everyday materials, I stitch, I sing and I write. I am interested in material narratives, how things hold stories and how materials are tied up in narrative experience. I am invested in dreams and wishful thinking, as much as functionality and feeling like a necessary part of a system – in short I am interested in belonging, how I belong, how we belong, how things belong to a situation especially those that don't seem to make any sense. Dealing with loss, inevitable changes, isolation and separation, life is an exercise of letting go, living with brokenness and trying to meet my surrounding not with defiance but generosity. We all belong together – the loss, the hurt, the joy, the humans, plants, animals, rocks and minerals. That is why I am invested in making ecosystems: installations in which the individual parts, objects, scents, texts, songs and video alike not only reference but dependent on each other. My work is influenced by botany, feminist practices, by stories that are handed down from one generation to the next and a deep ecological concern for the care we return to our environment. The materials and craft practices I deploy – pottery, stitching, cutting, gluing, assembling – reference domesticity and often gendered labour. I cherish the fragile, the delicate and tenderness as the vitality and determination of my practice. I work with textures, texture as stories, textures as something resonating in the hollow of the mouth, vibrating under the tips of fingers or as an aftertaste on tongues. And it is them, textures, that bring the various aspects of my work together in kaleidoscopic worlds on the edge of evaporation.

PUBLICATIONS

- 2024 Three Becomes Two Becomes One Becomes None Book Onomatopée, Eindhoven Leonie Brandner Eindhoven, Netherlands www.onomatopée.net/product/three-becomes-two-becomes-one-becomes-none/ The mandragora plant is one of the best-recorded gynaecological herbal substances. It is also the only plant in the European context historically depicted as a half-human-half-plant-creature. The mandragora was, is and continues to be haunted by stories. Could its many stories hold a key to lure our minds off paths well-trodden? What if the mandragora holds the potential for new orders and for world-making; for a cosmopoiesis of mandragoras. Three Becomes Two Becomes One Becomes None explores the medicinal and magical mandragora plant, and the many stories that grew around it across history. Artist Leonie Brandner's writing moves from the beginning of recorded storytelling to ancient Egyptian and Greek mythology, tracing the lines the mandragora has left behind in medicinal books, folklore and eventually the impact the plant had in the hunt on so-called witches in the Middle Ages. Gently weaving her own perception and encounters with the plant through her rigorous historical research, Leonie Brandner creates a kaleidoscopic image of human-plant-imaginings across time.

- 2021 Dreaming in the Museum - Potted Plants as Indicators of Trauma in Museological Settings Book myself Leonie Brandner Den Haag, Netherlands This text portrays the triangular history of potted plants, museum displays and trauma diagnosis. It is a collection of stories across time in different places, gathered almost like a bouquet of flowers – stories of peoples' lives, stories of potted plants and stories about the way we account for the fragmenting effects traumatic experiences can have. But above all it is a story about hope, wonder, and joy – the joys of experience, and in particular the joys of being in the world together.
