SEAN CHARLTON WHITE

Sean Charlton White (1997) is a Swiss-British freelance photographer, graphic designer and artist. Born in Switzerland, he is currently based in The Hague (NL) where he graduated from the photography department of the Royal Academy of Art The Hague (KABK) after completing a foundation year at ECAL. Besides his own practices, he works for The Wire magazine as a photo editor and designer, while also making books with Ben Weaver for Here Press and various other publishers.

Does the stock market make sense? NFTs? What about that white line in the train station platform - do we really need to know not to get too close? #mindthegap - Why are the Dutch so attracted to flatness yet all come to the Alps for their vacations? I am a curious person with many interests, and my work reflects this diversity as I take inspiration from my surroundings. My artistic practice questions the increasingly absurd world we have built for ourselves and where we are heading with it by bringing new perspectives and raise awareness about the issues of our current system and the inequalities it perpetuates towards people and nature. I do this by making photographic projects that reflect on society's relationship to its environment and the absurdities that transpire. The work that results navigates a fine line between documentary and satire, mixing documentary imagery with staged and manipulated pictures and documents that aim to challenge the audience views while also pushing it to question its relationship to images and media. My goal through this is to tackle complicated issues and give the viewer a point of entry to reflect and engage with the complexities of our surroundings through the use of humour. I am particularly interested in exploring the construct of reality, the intersection of truth and fiction, and the role that images play in shaping our understanding of the world and our interactions with it. My design practice comes from my passion for exploring the use of images in the book form and from an urge I feel to collaborate with others in this. I do this by making books with my own work but also and mostly through close collaborations with other artists, finding ways together to translate their projects and ideas into the book form while learning from each other.

- 2023 Chapter six : General Morphology of Urbanism The Balcony The Hague, Netherlands The sixth chapter of The Promise of Ruin(s) turns to the conceptual remnants of the Nature/Culture dichotomy, which became, since the Enlightenment, the dominant paradigm for understanding our relationship with the environment, justifying its commodification, and championing a historicity focused on the development of human civilization and its hub: the city. The exhibition's title is a play on the 19th-century book 'Generelle Morphologie der Organismen' ('General Morphology of Organisms') by German zoologist Ernst Haeckel. Known as a speculator among his peers, he often ventured to use the same physical laws to explain both the organic and the inorganic. Echoing his aim to account for interrelation, the artists in this chapter highlight the obsolete character of positioning nature as an autonomous entity in human development, while articulating how clinging to this binary distinction generates a feeling of absurdity in light of the proliferation of artificial

PROJECTS

- 2023 Welkom in Nederland: A Visual Study of Western Society Through The Dutch Neoliberal Utopia Netherlands
seancw.ch/wlkm I left my beloved Swiss hills and mountains nearly 4 years ago, to come live in the flat country that is the Netherlands. After having roamed the country at lengths hoping to better understand this place and looking for belonging, I find myself split between wonder, amusement, and disbelief, more confused than ever, not knowing what is constructed, natural, real or simulated. Welkom in Nederland is a semi-fictional satirical documentary about the Dutch neoliberal utopia that can, more generally, be extended to the West. The project reveals and questions the absurdities of Dutch society through its relationship to its environment while reflecting on my position within this place through self-portraits. In my search for understanding, as I focus on the mundane absurdities I have come across, I underline how constructed nature and mass media entangle with each other to create what we call reality. The use of documentary photography visual codes mixing facts and fiction produce images where the lines between facts and fiction are blurred, creating a satire that challenges traditional forms of documentary by exploring how the Dutch have re-shaped their reality through a highly constructed landscape as they turned their land into a product of the Anthropocene. The resulting images carefully reference the country's cultural heritage and (Dutch) photography history while also twisting them to add new meanings . These photographs, objects and archives create an alternate record of The Netherlands, closer to my subjective perception of it, pushing the viewer to question and challenge not only the value of images as document and how one can be easily manipulated but also his own view of what normalcy should and could be.

landscapes and ultra-controlled natural cycles. How to entertain the illusion of 'virgin nature' after capital's unstoppable expansion into what was once out of its reach? Through works that challenge the conventions of genres typically associated with faithful representations of reality, these artists transform urban areas organised by neoliberal structures—where such dissonances manifest most intensely—into sites of inquiry. Supported by Mondriaan and Stroom.
